CRUCIBLE STEEL.

a Tramp. The making of crucible steel was largely due to the efforts of a working slockryaker named Huntaman. He became diagrasted with the poor quality of the watch springs he was able to purchase, and determined to procure almself something better. He spent several years visiting the steel works of Europe pursuing his investigations. At the end of the time he erected a furnace and began to make steel, the quality of which had never before been equaled. He kept his method secret

for a time, but he was not destined to rvap much benefit from his discovery. The secret was stolen from him by a rival, who, in the disguise of a drunken tramp, sought shelter at his furnace one bitter stormy night. The tramp was allowed to warm at the furnace learned enough about the operation to reproduce it and make as good steel classed, among those of doubtful as Huntsman did. The tramp became wealthy by the result of his theft of ing of mineral, or in the matter of Huntsman's process, and in the course its financing, the editor of the Jorn of a few years the price of the highest Jubilee mine, Thumb Sutte district. mining men of national reputation, hars show a peculiar condition which were on the ground making exhaust- is known as "blister" steel. The openings of the furnace are level with the floor of the casting house, while each furnace has a separate flue fed by a powerful forced draft. When the steel is thoroughly melted the pots are withdrawn from the furnace and their contents emptied into molds. The lifting of the crucibles is a might that once seen will not readily be forgotten.
